Reddere personae scit convenientia cuique.1--Hor. An Poet. I Was loitering over my breakfast the next morning, and thinking of the last night s scene, when Lord Vincent was announced. How fares the gallant Pelham? said he, as he entered the room. Why, to say the truth, I replied, I am rather under the influence of blue devils this morning, and your visit is like a sunbsam in November. A bright thought, said Vincent, and I shall make you a very pretty little poet soon; publish you in a neat octavo, and dedicate you to Lady D e. Pray, by the by, have you ever read her plays? You know they were only privately printed? No, said I (for in good truth, had his lordship interrogated me touching any other literary production, I should have esteemed it a part of my present character to return the same answer). No! repeated Vincent; permit me to tell you that you must never seem ignorant of any work not published. To be admired, one must always know what other people don t, --and tben one has full liberty to sneer at the value of what other people do know. Renounce the threshold of knowledge. There, every new proselyte can meet you.
