Excerpt: .so acute that, without prompt relief, the patient in a few hours would have been in danger of death from sheer exhaustion. Under such circumstances a hyperdermic injection of morphine reduces pain until the measures adopted for the removal of the fermenting mass can produce their effect. Of course, the patient feels worse for it next day. But in the meantime I have saved him from hours of excruciating agony, and the dangerous exhaustion which is sure to follow long-continued and severe pain. Not to relieve a patient frantic with pain would be inhuman--more, it would be simple malpractice. Remember this: Drugs are evil things. They do not, cannot, cure. But they do at times relieve pain or dangerous symptoms; and in such cases their employment is not only advisable but imperative. At the same time I may add that I have treated many...
