Not illustrated. 1867 Excerpt: . . . chief kinds of simple sentence, viz. subject copula predicate, and subject verb transitive object. The first is given in Croesus fuit Rex; the second is omitted. But upon it, as I will proceed to shew under the Syntax of the genitive, an important further distinction depends. The Syntax, I think, is shrunk a little too much, and the Notes overloaded in proportion. Some such rule as this of Dr. Kennedys, 103, Obs. , was worth keeping, because it throws together most of the forms under which the subject of a sentence may appear: --Aliquando infinitivus, vel continuata locutio, vel adverbium cum genitivo pro nominativo ponitur. The following also entirely disappear from the text: --the ellipse of the pronominal subject, the relatives agreement with the pronoun understood in the possessive, fortunas meas qui, and c, the verb interposed agreeing with the latter of two nouns, and all mention of verbs impersonal, until we come to the genitive, 134, III. Now verbs impersonal are the main feature of a distinct form of principal sentence, and require prominence and notice in proportion. The contrast between the substantiva rei ejusdem and those rerum diversarum or diversae significationis, is cut out. This was useful, for it certainly gave point to both the rules, and, I think, helped the memory. The present arrangement appears to me more systematic, but less satisfactory. The Accusativi Syntaxis more nearly follows Kennedy in outline, throwing in, however, the rules about Spatium and Tempus, so far...
