Excerpt: . . . the Department coordinated with the National Science Foundation and the Bureau of Labor Statistics to create the approved list and I am sure the Department is prepared to discuss and describe their process. Despite what is a lengthy list, incongruities exist. For example, urban forestry is approved, but nursing is not. I believe it may be time to refocus the program and better define the goal of the program. While improving funding for high-tech courses is a valid goal, I think it ignores one of the major shortcomings of the GI Bill and that is the 30 percent of those who sign up but never use their benefit. College is not for everyone nor does a long-term degree program fit in every life situation. For example, those servicemembers who leave the military are often married with children and cannot afford 4 years away from the job market and need help in the form of affordable, short-term education or training in fields that may be normally viewed as non-high tech. I believe, therefore, the accelerated benefit program should be a tool to make veterans education benefits more flexible to help these veterans. We should focus primarily on improving access to non-degree programs. That would include things like short-term certification courses but not a course that is part of a degree. And given the level of sophistication in most sectors of the economy, it is hard to find jobs other than the most basic general labor that do not either require or strongly encourage formal education or training. Truck driving, for example. My district is the home to...
