Long Island has long been known as the place of untold numbers of disasters at sea, many ending tragically. Few afford the many accounts of individuals expressing their grief and compassion at the loss of humankind in such a disaster, especially when those lost were totally unknown to them. They Were All Strangers: The Wreck of the John Milton at Montauk, New York captures the dismal drama of a nineteenth century shipwreck - the heartbreak, horror, and sometimes lurid fascination. Described as one of the most beautiful vessels afloat, the John Milton, a medium clipper ship, set sail from its home port of New Bedford, Massachusetts early in 1855 to make long, arduous journeys around Cape Horn, South America, carrying an array of goods, and loads of gold-hungry prospectors from Long Island, New York and elsewhere to San Francisco in the mid 1850s. Upon landing, crew and passengers abandoned ship and set sail for the California hills in search of the illusive precious metal. Consequently, a new crew was assembled for the John...
