Here is the finest publication we have read right up until now. It is actually written in easy words instead of difficult to understand. The multinomial logit model above is a popular choice for modeling discrete choice data, and when data are rich and disaggregate the model is often robust (in terms of prediction success) to the implicit behavioral assumptions arising from the chosen error distribution (Louviere, Hensher, and Swait 2000), notably, the assumption of independence from irrelevant alternatives (IIA). This assumption, however, has motivated much of the research on extensions to the basic model, including the nested logit, mixed logit, and latent class specifications (Greene and Hensher 2002). We apply the latent class extension as a way to accommodate taste parameter heterogeneity, a situation that was clearly evidenced during qualitative research. The underlying theory of the latent class model is that choice depends on attributes that are observable, e. g. the attributes in the...
