Much of this dispute respecting the authenticity of Pare s writings doubtless had its origin in the fact that the College of Paris, composed exclusively of physicians, claimed the privilege of licensing books, a privilege which Pare Spurned, inasmuch as he had obtained a direct order for issuing his works from the king. The College had evidently not supposed that a surgeon could write so great a treatise upon anatomy, surgery, pharmacy, campaigns, and natural history; its range was far beyond their comprehension, and it was therefore perhaps natural for them, especially as they were extremely jealous of their imagined rights, to accuse Pare of having furnished merely a compilation, the labor chie?y of young physicians, as if young medical men were more competent to compose a treatise on surgery than one who had devoted a whole lifetime to its practice and contemplation.
