A genoux, enfans debauchee, Chers confidants de mes pechez. EARLY in the seventeenth century, the desire fell upon France to laugh. The country had been melancholy for a whole generation; for, with the exception of the Satyre Menippe and a few squibs, there was nothing at all to laugh at. Literature under Malherbe was solemn; mirth, malice, and merriment seemed well-nigh dead. Give us, cried the Parisians, something new and amusing. We have got through all our troubles. King Louis XIII. is, to be sure, a foolish, even a malignant creature, but there are no more sieges and no more blockades; and so let us laugh. The demand created a supply, and though the Fronde brought fresh civil wars, it left the people, as it found them, laughing. There were Turlupin, Scaramouche, Arlequin, on the stage, and there were Theophile Viaud, DAssoucy, Scarron, Voiture, Boisrobert among the poets and writers. It is of this goodly society that we have now to treat. The student of French literature, who must read them, will find in them no reflection whatever of the artistic efforts of Ronsard and Du Bellay: they are careless as to what Malherbe might have thought: they write by no rules of art, but can defend themselves on attack; and they pour out their songs regardless of any criticism but the voice of the people. It is characteristic of French literature that the best poets have been those who...
