Excerpt: . . . A commonly identified weakness in applications is that too much effort is spent citing too broad a range of material that has been written on the general topic and not enough effort on organizing the review in light of the specific area they want to investigate. On the other hand, reviewers will be looking to see that the review is complete and that all important studies or areas are included. Applicants should be careful to include the appropriate and relevant range of research studies Care should be taken to write with a balanced tone while identifying and conveying the strengths and the weaknesses of existing studies. Finally, although the Background and Significance section should be substantive and demonstrate insight, breadth, and mastery, the applicant is advised to stay within the recommended page-limit guidelines. The applicant should state the background to the issue or topic of study (that is, its general and broadest implications and relevance to various public constituencies) and the significance of the study aims to particular public health issues, concepts, data, and or current practices, as appropriate. Applicants should keep in mind that Significance is one of the five review criteria by which the application will be evaluated (see Research Project Evaluation Criteria, page 22) and should consider the following questions in conceptualizing and describing the project: Does this study address an important problem If the aims of the application are achieved, how will scientific knowledge be advanced What will be...
