Excerpt from A Trip to the English Lakes: In May, 1864 Then we can post on afterwards. Now, are you game for Whit Tuesday? Certainly, if you ll only write to the weather office for a little lain, and a change of wind - but seriously, send word to our mutual friend as Podsnap has it, ridiculous opportunity, but so glad of it, I am sure. Banting is a vastly agreeable fellow; he remembers more than most men ever knew; thoroughly understands what to eat, what to drink, and what to avoid; and is of that remarkable class which is never in a hurry, never late for a train, or behind an appointment; never shocked nor surprised at whatever may turn up, nor perturbed in the slightest degree by circumstances the most weighty and perplexing. No one I should like to meet better, bar yourself, of course - present company you know is always excepted in personal allusions in good society; and as Punch tells us this is sure to be a fine spring, as the year of grace 1864 is leap year, we ll hope this cutting nor -easter may change, and allow us the hilarity of the charming season of hopeful spring in the most delightful district of the north. Go? of course, old boy, and in such company! I am so glad of the opportunity, I really am. Such was the invitation of my two friends on the 5th of May, of whose genial hospitality I availed myself last August. Happily, on the 11th, the wind veered round the right way, and nothing could be more acceptable. Vegetation sprang into activity as if influenced by a forcing house,...
