He learns readily by experience and cannot a second time be persuaded to do what has once injured him. He cannot learn to read, but he will turn the pages of a zoology, promptly recognizing the pictures, and showing his familiarity with the traits of the animals represented. He has the sense to throw a rope to a companion who has fallen overboard; and one has been known to submit without resistance to surgical treatment, manifesting gratitude when he experienced the relief which he seemed to expect from the operation. He is persistently studying the working of some tool or machine, learning to use keys, hammers, and even dangerous implements. The brown capuchin is exceedingly fond of investigation, expressing great delight when he finds how to work a lever or a screw; and he never tires of applying in other ways the mechanical principle he has discovered. Yet with all his wisdom, the monkey still remains an imitator, and never becomes an inventor; he can use tools, but never makes them. He is sensitive to cold and will hover about a fire, but he has never learned to kindle one, or in any way to improve upon his condition. Therefore he could not be the ideal creature which Nature was seeking. CHAPTER XIII. Larger Brains And Hearts. Looking back in review over the whole animal kingdom, making a summary of what had been accomplished in both physical and mental development, we perceive...
