The day had been warm, though not unusually so, and now a thunder storm which had been sometime hovering in the north seemed almost to cover the lines along which the tornadoes swept a few minutes later. Those who noted carefully the cloud movements saw that a low and very open stratum of clouds was moving rapidly to the north or perhaps a little west of north, while the heavier and darker stratum of storm-clouds was moving to the south above the first layer. Both these strata of clouds were Open enough to give occasional glimpses through to the upper air where a third stratum of thin white clouds ?oated quietly as on a calm summer afternoon. The air at the surface of the earth was moving northward as a brisk breeze. Doubtless there were many who felt an ominous dread of the coming storm, and not a few spoke of their fears, yet, had nothing extraordinary succeeded, all might have gone on as usual and all trace of forboding have been oh literated from the memory.
