From The Saturday Review, Vol. 102: In a manner Mr. Conrads book marks an epoch, since it is written in praise of ships, by a man who has sailed them, whose style and shapes shall be sailed no more. It is, as it were, a last chanty sung to those proud canvas wings by which England clove her way to power: to her mastery of the seas and then to the wealth of them. Mr. Conrads day was after that of the sailed fighting ships, its significance lies in its coincidence with the dying out of the type of men and the stamp of spirit which manned them; with the gradual transference of our sea-borne trade from the hands of islanders to those of aliens. . . Of the change, and its menace to our dominion of the seas, Mr. Conrad is acutely and regretfully conscious. Looking in that mirror of the sea he can discern one altered face, the face of a people disinclined for discomfort, unstimulated by the promise of great adventure, no longer inspired by the future, inflating itself contentedly by the fireside with the memories of its achievements while others slip in unobserved to steal the reins of power out of its indolent hands. With the passing of the sailing ship has passed, or is passing, the manner of men who sailed her, men to whom the ceaseless, unrelenting struggle with the sea was a joy and a glory as well as a trade, who faced the implacable oceans, the inexorable winds, as knights of old faced an enemy, praying that he might be worthy of their valor and address. These men it was who gave...
