Excerpt from The Australasian Medical Gazette, Vol. 11: The Accredited Organ of All the Principal Medical Societies in Australia and New Zealand; From October 1891, to December 1892 I was so imbued with the common-sense reasoning of the article that I at once set about obtaining picrate of sodium for my patients, and was fortunate enough to succeed in getting it made in Melbourne, where I am now actively using it, in conjunction with tuberculine, in doses beginning at f of a grain. One poor fellow, whose is not a suitable case for injections of tuberculine, has been taking picrine alone as a solatium, and has benefited thereby. His sputum has become less purulent, is more frothy and less bacterial, the bacilli showing decided signs of degeneration. Weight has been gained. And the appetite is immense. I have now had a total of 16 cases of phthisis under my care for the last eight months, and the least that can be said of those considered cured or well is, that they show no signs of relapse so far. That a great deal of work is entailed by the inclusion of tuberculine in the modern treatment of tubercular diseases is manifest that few care to face it when such an easy excuse is to hand as that its use is attended by danger to the patient, is also manifest, whilst, again, there are men who do not believe in antiseptics, and could therefore never be expected to know the significance of a sterilized test tube or syringe, far less the preparation of sputum for the microscope. It is therefore clear that tuberculine even much more useful than it has been...
