In our archaeological literature the generic term discoidal or bicave is applied indiscriminately to all round, non-spherical objects of stone, shell, bone or hematite, and sometimes of pottery manufacture. Those shown in center of picture are composed of granite and quartzite, are convex and concave and beveled on sides, which are art relics of the Stone Age. When asked to what use these bicave stones were applied, the general answer is for playing games. We ask, How is this fact known? We answer, it is not known, but merely surmised; merely inferred from the accounts of early writers who saw the Aborigines gambling with round stones, called chungke. Judging the prehistoric Americans by their present day descendants, I we may well rest assured that they were...
