Introduction.--Early in the study of the glacial limits in Ohio important differences were recognized between the drift-covered and the driftless areas of the state. At that time Wright² emphasized 1 Originally written under the direction of Professor Barrows, of the University of Chicago, to whom the author is much indebted for helpful criticism. 2 Geol. of Ohio, Vol. V, p. 767. sized the influences of glaciation on the character of the soil, on the contour of the country, and on the minor lines of drainage, concluding that the ice-sheet pretty much made the most fertile portions of the state. Little or no work has been done since in Ohio to test such a broad generalization. Indeed, the literature bearing on the general subject is surprisingly meager, and with a few notable exceptions³ deals only in broad generalizations. The definite determination of the influences of glaciation is not an easy problem, for it is difficult, in some cases perhaps impossible, to know what conditions would exist had glaciation not occurred.⁴ An approximation to the truth, however, is a comparison of areas, alike or nearly alike, in essential features,...
