Not illustrated. 1898 Excerpt: .and early spring, nothing was visible; as the spring advanced, first the canals and then the spots began to appear; as spring passed into summer, both grew more and more evident; and so on into the full tide of midsummer manifestation. Evidently, then, the change of seasons was a factor in the process. But there is more in the matter than this. The development takes place in a manner to imply that something more immediate than the change in the seasons is concerned in it; immediate not in time, but in relation to the result. A comparison of the behavior of three spots--the Phoenix Lake, Ceraunius (the spot at the junction of the Iris and the Gigas), and the Cyane Fons (a spot where the Steropes, a newly found canal, and the Nilus meet)--will serve to point out what this something is. The Phoenix Lake lies...
