WATER SYSTEMS IN STATES States and EPA should work together to address significant violations of monitoring and reporting requirements. States and EPA should work together to address violations of MCL and treatment technique requirements. States and EPA should work together to address violations at noncommunity water systems. EPA and the States are working to address these recommendations on a number of fronts. Improving compliance requires a mix of compliance assistance, capacity building activities, and targeted enforcement activities. A key part of improving compliance with both health-based standards and monitoring and reporting requirements is ensuring that operators of public water systems have the information and the training they need to do their jobs properly. The 1996 Amendments provided funding to support nine technology assistance centers to help small systems with training, technical assistance, and technology demonstrations. Additionally, EPA and the States facilitate compliance with existing drinking water requirements by conducting numerous compliance assistance activities, such as on-site visits and development and distribution of plain English guides and checklists on regulatory requirements. EPA, with its State and drinking water stakeholder partners, are also working pro-actively to ensure that the operators of public water systems understand and are prepared to comply with new requirements, like Consumer Confidence Reports, and new standards, like the Disinfection By-products Rule. EPA is using the new Local Government Environmental Assistance Network (LGEAN)as an interactive platform to provide free information on current and developing SDWA requirements. LGEAN provides information and compliance tools...
