Not illustrated. 1914 Excerpt: . invested only five thousand dollars and that George Smith, after forming a partnership agreement with him, had contributed the other five thousand dollars. The agreement, let us say, calls for the sharing of profits or losses equally, and the payment of a salary of two hundred and fifty dollars a month to each. Mr. Brown is to have sole charge of the sales and buying activities, and Mr. Smith of the financial, accounting and office activities, including all purchases other than hats. The opening entries would differ only in these respects: the memorandum in the journal would be more complete, setting forth the essential details of the copartnership agreement as just outlined. There would be two cash book entries for the investments, one crediting Albert Brown with five thousand dollars, the other crediting George Smith s capital account with the same amount. Suppose that instead of the partners contributing $5,000 each, Brown had contributed ten thousand dollars in cash and Smith an equity in a small office building, the equity amounting to twenty-five thousand dollars. The total value of the property, let us say, is seventy-five thousand dollars, but a mortgage of fifty thousand dollars is recorded against it. The opening memorandum in the journal would be as in the foregoing case, except that it would be changed to correspond with the new facts. In the cash book, Brown s cash contribution would be recorded in the usual manner, but Smith s would require somewhat...
