Excerpt from Trace Hydrocarbon Analysis: The National Bureau of Standards Prince William Sound/Northeastern Gulf of Alaska Baseline Study The purpose of this investigation was to develop analytical techniques adequate to determine the low levels of hydrocarbons anticipated in pollution baseline studies in pristine environments. These techniques were to be sensitive at the sub - microgram per kilogram (ppb) level and suitable to handle the paramount problems of analytical blanks and component recoveries. Furthermore, it was desired that these analytical methods would ultimately permit the identification and quantitation of individual components among the hydrocarbons present in the samples. To date several authors and groups have developed methods for the analysis of hydrocarbons in marine samples [1 These methods are of three basic types: a screening method for total extractable hydrocarbons [1]; a headspace analysis method specific for low molecular weight hydrocarbons and a method involving digestion or extraction of the sample followed by clean - up and concentration procedures and gas chromatographic analysis of the hydrocarbon components from the sample Careful evaluation of each of these three basic methods revealed certain limitations when considered in terms of the goals of this study.
