THE MAN THAT NEVER GREW UP: A NOVEL (CLASSIC REPRINT)

Excerpt from The Man That Never Grew Up: A Novel The Judge pushed back his chair from the table with the air of a man who had finished his breakfast - or rather a man who didnt want any breakfast at all. He was engaged in folding his napkin carefully, when the door to the kitchen opened and Easter Sunday stood looking down upon him, her mighty hands resting upon her still mightier hips, as she regarded him with positive disapproval. Easter Sunday Jackson was very large and very colored, and owed her excessively Christian name to the fact that she had first seen the light of this world upon that day of all days in the Church calendar, some fifty-odd years before. The Judge started guiltily at the mere sight of Easter, and quickly hitched his chair a trifle nearer to the table and hastily swallowed another mouthful of coffee from the almost untouched cup. While this was manifestly an act of propitiation, it was also an out-and-out confession of remissness, and Easter was not to be deceived thereby.
