Busz 33 has also observed corundum as a contact product of granite on clay slate at Dartmoor, in Devonshire, England. Barrois describes banded violet and green hornstones produced by metamorphism in granite at Pont-Paul, near Morlaix, in Finisterre, France. The violet layers consist of biotite, magnetite, pleonaste, corundum, andalusite, staurolite, quartz, and pyrite, and are thought to have been originally a highly aluminous shale. As a contact product on nepheline-syenite, Raysay has described corundum from the Kola Peninsula, Archangel government, Russia. A massif of nepheline-syenite occurs in TTmptek, with border facies comparatively free from nepheline (umpteckite). On the east side this rock is bordered by sillimanite-gneiss, between the layers of which the syenite is intruded in sheets of variable thickness down to microscopic dimensions; but in all cases the boundaries of the two rocks are clearly defined. The gneiss contains, besides sillimanite, zoisite, garnet, spinel, corundum, and magnetite. The last three occur in elongated masses in quartz-feldspar aggregates. Salomon found corundum in the phyllites metamorphosed by quartz-mica-diorite and tonalite in the vicinity of Mount Adamello, in the Alps of Lombardy, Italy. The phyllites have been converted into hornstone containing cordierite, andalusite, sillimanite, tourmaline, spinel, zircon, corundum, and other minerals. Some layers of the rock are rich in corundum. - System of Mineralogy, 6th ed., 189. p. 212. 21 Sur les enclaves aelcles des roches volmnlques de...
