A wavy white birch cast its flicker of tender green, and checkered the sunlight on a little mound of upraised turf where a few wild wood-violets were blooming. Gyp threw his weak, weary little body down under the birch, laid his black nose between his paws and watched that narrow patch of earth, chased with sunlight and shadow, with sad-eyed vigilance. Sissy was sleeping there. She would save him from the cruel law! Yes, Sissy had said the good God-man would take care of even Gyp, and so he did, for thus it all fell out. While the burly officer stood awaiting some answer to his direful threat, poor Robbie,...
