Army War College, 1997 OCLC Number: (OCoLC)44376204 Subject: Democracy -- Haiti -- Congresses. Excerpt: . . . Various speakers emphasized that Haitis nascent and fragile democracy remains at risk. If international involvement is to make a difference, it must be appropriate to the countrys needs and capacities, and adequately, consistently, and carefully designed in concert with Haitian involvement and a long-range vision. If the United States and the international community do not respond appropriately to the aspirations of Haitian citizens for a legitimate, stable government, economic growth, and domestic security, there are likely to be major setbacks to the consolidation of democracy, including a possible breakdown in public order. Ultimately, of course, Haitians have the primary responsibility for their own destiny. Even if the United States and the interntional community respond effectively, it will be Haitians who will determine whether that response takes root. Neither the United States nor the international community has the intellectual or political capability to fix Haiti. Even if they provided all the necessary resources--plant all the trees, generate full employment, eliminate disease and hunger--none of this would last without Haitian leadership and responsibility. The Discussion. During the ensuing discussion, one of the panelists asserted that the Clinton administration, in its determination to declare U. S. policy a success, had politicized the Haiti issue. In the process, it had ignored very real problems, particularly in the area of human rights abuses, and withheld information from Congress. The speaker said that the United States should press the Haitian government to pursue the intellectual authors of the political killings that had occurred since the September 1994 intervention. In response, another panelist agreed that it...
