Excerpt from Overseas, Vol. 5: The Monthly Journal of the Overseas Club and Patriotic League; March 1920 No doubt it will surprise many people to read this estimate of a statesman of the first rank. They will be perplexed not less by the sketches of M. Clemenceau and Mr. Lloyd George. How is it possible, they will ask, that the happiness of hundreds of millions of people can have depended upon a very old and tired man, dry in soul and empty of hope, surveying the scene with a cynical and almost impish expression, and upon another man who, though marvellously quick and clever, gifted with six or seven senses not available to ordinary men, was chiefly intent upon doing a deal and taking home to England something which would pass muster for a week. Further, these astonished people may go on to enquire what qualifications Mr. Keynes has to pass judgment upon these great men. Well, Mr. Keynes has two chief qualifications. He is...
