Mrs. Hasan always laundered her family s clothes early in the mornings, usually when I was brushing my teeth and getting ready for school. Sometimes, I even swished water in my mouth in tune with her pounding. Mrs. Jivraj s pounding was timid, as uncertain and mousy as her own self. It was as if she were afraid someone might hear the thumping and complain. The pounding from Mrs. Sidhu s house was the loudest. She did not care who heard and who complained. It was her wash that filled the air with the powerful scent of the blue bar soap she appeared to use in excess amount. I wondered if Mrs. Nathu ever got her clothes washed. Her ready-made frocks always looked crisp and trendy, as though they had just come off the racks at Harrods in London. One wet day, I asked Malini where she thought Mrs. Nathu got her clothes washed. Lady Macbeth, you mean? Malini chuckled, standing outside her home, holding her face to the rain. Mama Hatari, the terror lady? Don t you know? Her Highness doesn...
