The passage of troops enrolled for the protection of a beleaguered Capital and an imperilled Federal Government, through the territory of a State still in the Union would seem to be a matter of right simple enough in its nature, and which under ordinary circumstances would neither have created comment nor excited Opposition. At the period we are considering, however, the circumstances were in a high degree extraordinary, and such transit was held by many to involve a vital principle and a high political right. A significant importance attaches therefore to all the steps that were taken to claim for the special surroundings the fullest consideration on the part of the general government and involved the right to ask that existing arrangements that threatened so much serious disaster should be wisely modified, so that the inevitable conflict between the troops then on the outskirts of the City and our own citizens armed to oppose them might be happily avoided. What was done therefore on this line has its special value, for by it the dreaded emergency was avoided, while at the same time the instant needs of the Government were met. But more than this was attained, for in my own opinion the result of such armed conflict would have gone...
