Norcross, Justice of the Supreme Court; Delivered at the University of Nevada, May 17, 1911, Upon the Occasion of the Twenty-Fifth Anniversary of the Establishment of the State University at Reno There were represented in that convention lawyers, doctors, bankers, miners, farmers, lumbermen, merchants, editors, surveyors, and artisans. It was a representative body of Pacific Coast Pioneers. Men of character, ability, integrity, fortitude and energy. They realized that they had been called upon to play an important part in the great struggle that was then testing the life of the Nation. They knew that Nevada at that time possessed little that ordinarily is considered essential to make a State - a shifting and uncertain population, gathered mainly around a few mining camps, was nearly all. The very wealth which Nature had secreted in the hills was to be taken out and removed to other more attractive climes. Railroads there were none, the nearest railroad point then being twelve hundred miles away. The telegraph had arrived, but the ox and mule team, the stage and the pony express were destined to be the mode of travel and communication and the only avenue of commerce for some years to come. A few, who were not entirely blinded by the lure of gold and silver, saw in agriculture and kindred pursuits a slower, more modest, but more certain, fortune. The most accessible waterways were applied in a crude way to irrigation, and agriculture, that industry which must eventually share equally at least with mining in the permanent greatness of our State, had its beginning.
