Leptis Magna was the family home of a dynasty of Roman emperors founded by Emperor Septimius Severus in the late 2nd century. This searching and historically accurate memoir is written from the point of view of a son from that same family some 200 years later. His is a world much changed since his great, great, great, great granduncle was emperor. There are parallels between his world and ours. He lived in a time historians call Late Antiquity, a time when one world, the classical world, came to an end and a new world, the medieval world, was born. It was a time of epic cultural transition. The book recounts the journey of Septimius Lucius to the court of the emperor to appeal for protection from raiding tribes. There he is accused of treason by a corrupt general, and his fate and that of his family and city are forever changed by the way he answers this charge. Based on a true story by a Roman historian. In a world of fading Roman power, raiding tribes and corrupt imperial officials, the people of Leptis Magna look to him for guidance and protection. He does not know which way to turn. In the deafening silence and remorseless presence of the Sahara desert an answer appears. This item ships from La Vergne, TN. Paperback.
