VINCENT. Friday, 1th February, 1879.--We came aboard the good S.S. Conway Castle last evening in a steam launch, from the railway wharf at Kingswear, a distance of some 200 yards. The state-room we had selected was said to be the best on the ship: it was the most forward deck cabin on the port side, and had one port-hole looking towards the sea, and one large port-hole towards the bow, and a nice square window towards the gangway, which window also had a louvre--or, as my steward called it-- jealously board; the door opened on the same side as the window. Besides the two bunks, the lower of which I occupied, there was a nice sofa. Our first night s rest had been much disturbed; the pens in which the fowls, the geese, the ducks, the turkeys, and other animals were confined were just outside our state-room, some on the deck and some on the bridge above our heads; and these animals did not fail to make their presence known long before the first streaks of daylight appeared. Although we were often disturbed by these animals afterwards, yet when we crossed the line we found that we had been correctly informed, and that our stateroom was always the coolest place in the ship. One little incident that occurred last night is, I think, worth mentioning: --I was busily engaged writing letters, using my own ink-pot, a recent purchase,...
