The United States intervention in Somalia in 1992, on humanitarian grounds, is very relevant today as we witness the events unfolding in Iraq, Syria and Turkey. The Kurds, a people without a homeland, is also central to the problem that seem insolvable at this time. In the current situation the U. S involvement is not altogether altruistic. There is genuine concern to protect this country and its people from the threat posed by those who would destroy our way of life. This does not, of course, take away from a desire to render humanitarian assistance to those in need. In the Somali context, the United States intervention was implemented to alleviate the suffering of the Somali people. In the end, the intervention failed because of bureaucratic ineptitude on the part of the International Community. The U. S military was tasked with the responsibility of bringing some level of stability to a war torn country. However the mission failed because the equipment the military needed to carry out its mandate was refused by the bureaucrats in Washington. Tony Dillett is on...
