Excerpt from The Journal of Analytical Chemistry, 1887, Vol. 1 The water at once begins to carry the lighter and finer particles. It is necessary to keep tapping the residue with some convenient object, such as a platinum spatula, so as to prevent any graphite from being retained by the heavier crystals, and to keep the current flowing evenly over the whole residue. The separation soon becomes apparent, the graphite being carried forward faster than the heavier crystals. At this stage it is necessary to remove with a magnet any remaining magnetic particles, since these interfere with the separation. When, after three or four hours, all the graphite had been washed from the inclined plane, the water was drained off and the residue allowed to dry. When dry, it formed a stream of bright metallic luster throughout the whole length of the plane. The material was then swept together and treated in a beaker with hot hydrochloric acid of sp. Gr. For the removal of a little iron. It was then again placed upon one of the sections of the inclined plane, and any remaining graphite separated from it. This second separation is not nearly so tedious as the first. Several separations of 250 grams each were made, and about one gram of pure material for analysis was obtained.
