Not illustrated. 1834 Excerpt: .of pure and massy gold, with small bells of the same metal attached to them; and on her arms, bangles of the same; her glossy dark hair was parted in front, a la Madonna, and hung down behind, plaited in long strings; it was confined in its position by a band of pearls, and a large emerald, encircled with diamonds, sparkled on her forehead; over the back of A species of bracelet, but having no clasp: these and the anklets are frequently the sole dowry of an Eastern bride, and, amongst the lower classes, by no means a contemptible one. A her head, and flowing down to her heels, was a piece of fine tissue veiling, but not concealing the black silken tresses beneath. Her large liquid eyes beamed with a voluptuous expression, and her voice was soft and sweet. What to me was unusual, but agreeable, was, that she accompanied herself on a small lute, the musicians who attended only occasionally joining in. With that courtesy to strangers which invariably distinguishes the nobles of the East, the Prince of Oude, for such he was, invited me to dismount and be seated next him. I readily complied, and was immediately presented with a pipe and some iced sherbet. For an hour, which past most quickly, I admired the beauty and melodious voice of this elegant singer; but the morning star having warned me, I took leave of my noble entertainer, and proceeded on my journey. Who...
