Locke, Thomas, and O Hara<sup>08</sup> reported that they had on their pneumonia service at the Boston City Hospital, ninety-four cases of lobar pneumonia in children under 15 years of age of which only four died. Forty-two cases were typed, and revealed that of these, eleven were Type I; five were Type II; four were Type III, and twenty-two were Type IV. Of the four fatal cases, two were untyped, one was Type I and one was Type IV. Because of the low mortality, no antipneumococcus treatment was given to those patients who were under 5 years of age. Armstrong <sup>09</sup> in England reported rather contradictory findings to those of the Boston investigators. He noted that the Type I pneumococcus, though responsible for many cases of lobar pneumonia in adults, does not appear to cause the disease in childhood. In only one case was a Type I pneumococcus isolated from a child. The pneumococci he found most responsible for the disease in young children belonged almost uniformly to Type II. Type III seemed in the upper respiratory tract to have only a limited distribution. For rapid pneumococcus typing, Oliver <sup>70</sup> described a precipitin test of filtered pneumonic sputum to which bile has been added. By this method the typing may be effected within half an hour after the receipt of the sputum. According to Nobecourt, Paraf and Bonnet,<sup>71</sup> at the Paris Maternite, during 1919, all the infants and adults were systematically examined for pneumococci...
