Lies and Big Feet., United States, 2017. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand . What happens if we construe print technology as being performative? Undoubtedly - such a concept is indebted to Judith Butler, but are we not all cognizant of it? In the colonial context in India (1780-)- which was essentially a scribal culture, manuscripts were construed as corrupt and many variants existed. Print had to perform the role of being absolute and fixed; but what if this performance of print fails? What if we considered manuscripts as being equally valid forms of communication as was print? The onslaught of certain aspects of print technology in the last two decades of the 19th century in colonial Calcutta, India - initiated an epistemic shift in a manuscript-scribal realm. The socio-cultural characteristics of print - that it was more authoritative and correct/truthful than manuscripts- were also imported. But is there any ontological truth to these socially ascribed aspects of print? Is the advent of print an inevitable progression from a manuscript-scribal society? Religious manuscripts were transferred onto printed texts and the desire was to arrive at the perfect narrative; there existed many variants of the same text and the translators would consult many editions that had been written in different time periods and collate them. What becomes evident is that there was no single authoritative text and there existed many variants of the same religious text. What would we have gained if we knew for a truth that there existed different variants of the same Hindu shastras and that they were altered as they were handed down over the centuries? The emergence of print in colonial Calcutta in the last two decades of the 19th century is a story that we know about. But...
