Quivering motions (fibrillary cramps) of the enfeebled muscles have been observed; these motions are quite irrespective of the will of the patient, who may be even unconscious of them. The mental faculties remain intact. The affected muscles lose their electro-contractility in proportion as they become atrophic and degenerated, while the unaffected muscles respond fully to the electrical current. The progress of the disease is slow and the prognosis very unfavourable, but recovery has taken place in a few instances The mean duration is about one year. Causes.--These are obscure. It rarely occurs under adult age. Males are more often affected than females. It has been supposed to be due to excessive muscular exertion. In many instances, several members of the same family have been sufferers from the affection, but it appears to have no connexion with particular occupations or social condition.
