Not illustrated. 1876 Excerpt: . presence in the land, he is the prince, and Israel s guilty king must come to him. Ahab returns with Obadiah in eager haste, yet with his hard heart burning with wrath and resentment against the Prophet. And it came to pass, when Ahah saw Elijah, that Ahab said unto him, Art thou he that troubleth Israel? Picture this little scene, the king of Israel, and the humbly clad prophet of Jehovah. Anger and hate on the king s countenance, mingled with fear and dread of the humble prophet before him. Noble is the bearing of Elijah, stem and commanding is the expression of his features, and as his piercing eye looks into the face of the king, it flashes with the fire of righteous indignation. The proud monarch shrinks from that gaze, as the last word of his own haughty inquiry dies upon his lips; and as the Prophet hurls back the charge into his teeth, Ahab quails as a convicted criminal beneath the glance of the man of God. I have not troubled Israel; but Thou, and thy father s house, in that ye have forsaken the commandments of the Lord, and thou hast followed Baalim. The trembling king stands conscience stricken and condemned before the man, who had been a fugitive from the land on which God s curse lay. No word can he utter of self-vindication, he can but wait for further words from Elijah s lips in awed silence. And...
