Brand New Book. Excerpt from Outcomes of Old Oxford Why do you write always about your successful con temporaries I am sure that the men who have gone to grief are much more interesting people, and the scenes in which they have figured far more picturesque. So said my clever hostess, whose husband had just passed a kind comment upon certain sketches of old friends from my pen which had recently seen the light. Because, was my reply, I dare not hand down to public scorn the faults and failings of men who have gone under. There are incidents in one s own career in the past which one would fain forget, and it would add an intolerable bitterness to death to think that some prentice hand was planning to record the skeleton in your chamber for the diversion of the thoughtless atoms who make up in the aggregate the reading public.
