Y., January 11, 1913 There is nothing that I can say about Hamilton which will be novel to members of a club that bears his name. Yet after the passage of all these years, what a splendid memory that personality suggests, what a romance-that life was, what a revelation of human power and of human service his contributions to mankind and to the progress of civilization! I like to think of the strands that entered into the making of that personality and that character. There was the high-purposed, rugged determination of the Scot, together with the almost fanatical devotion and enthusiasm of the Huguenot; these strands not meeting and intertwining under ordinary circumstances or under a gray and unfriendly sky, but under the bright sun of the West Indies on a little point of rich volcanic land, representing, perhaps, the ambition of mother earth to thrust herself up thru the blue waters of the tropical ocean in order to make a fit birthplace for a political...
