Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Louisiana Conservationist, Vol. 8: March, 1956 I wheeled into the driveway of the W. C. Windham home, 16 miles southeast of Tallulah, which is in the heart of the finest white-tailed deer range in these United States. Why bring a bird dog to this place? For something different. We were to go into Cottonwood Island and kick up a few coveys. South of Vicksburg is Cottonwood, accessible only by water or plane. The deer hunting rights are leased, but we'd gotten permission to try the birds, just following the close of the deer season. Its near inaccessibility might account for some of the bird populace, but I think it's the near-ideal quail habitat of the island. We took the two automatics apart, placed them in the little yellow Cub and Billy Windham, my hunting companion for the afternoon, petted the light plane into cranking. After a brief motor warmup I motioned the setter to take a seat in my lap, strapping us both in the craft. She wasn't excited, she'd flown before and after all...
