I know what you're thinking: why do I need to scavenge when I have already stockpiled everything that I could possibly need? But here's the truth, even if you're a lifelong prepper, there are still items that you may have forgotten. It's also possible that the disaster could last longer than you anticipated and you run out of something critical. Or even yet, it's possible that there was an item you never thought you needed but it turns out you do need. For example, what if you lose or run out of your prescription medications and you need to find replacement medication quickly? What if your vehicle breaks down and you need to find replacement parts? What if you run out of water purification tablets? What if you start running low on food or ammunition? There are a limitless number of scenarios where you could have to scavenge for supplies in a disaster scenario. Scavenging is not the same thing as looting or raiding. Whereas both of those things involve people using force to break into homes or business establishments to forcefully steal things (and perhaps even damage property or harm people in the process), scavenging is all about carefully, discreetly, and safely searching for abandoned supplies that you can use to your own benefit. There's a lot of stigma attached to scavenging in an SHTF scenario, but the reality is that it's something that we could all find ourselves doing when the grid goes down and we run out of something critical. This guide is going to explain how you can scavenge in an SHTF scenario, from a mindset of being as safe...
