However, now known that many bacteria the laboratory adopt unusual dormant states when subjected to the nutrient-limited conditions of many ecosystems, which, turn, makes them difficult to culture. This our current to culture the vast majority of bacteria known to reside natural environment. Knowledge of the presence of some species a natural environment can be of crucial importance, with particularly respect to detection of pathogenic or to monitor the fate and of manipulated genetically organisms within ecosystems. Therefore, there has been much effort generated to develop new and novel methods for detection, and recovery of organisms from natural habitats. Central to many of these methods has been the development and application of the techniques of molecular to environmental biology. These have resulted directly from molecular biology and DNA without the need for any culture. There is doubt that would not have been without the revolution in computer technology that has to the development of data accessible high speed of information. Molecular methods have been harnessed and exploited to the development of methods that enable rapid and automated of microorganisms from natural environment.
