THE BEHOLO PRELUDE The horrible news had even reached Grazhni. The very fact that it had spread as far as this Lithuanian hamlet is sufficient indication that the news must have been startling indeed. For had not Grazhni overslept an eclipse of the sun one bright summer morning and discovered the occurrence of that phenomenon from a chance traveller nearly a month after its skies had been darkened Even the terrifying report of the Dekabrists had scarcely penetrated the heart of this village, though the iron ruler Nicholas the First had been steadying his throne and tightening the reins of his administration for more than two years. Grazhni received the first inkling of this news the day after the Feast of Tabernacles. It was a gloomy day. Besides the depression that usually follows a long holiday nature added a touch of sadness to the occasion....
