Not illustrated. 1869 Excerpt: . . . country wooves with its flowers; the autumn, and the air is laden with balm; the winter, with its merry parties in gay salons, its carousals, its carnivals; and still the poor girl leads on her dismal life, dreading each day as it comes with its burden, asking her heart if in the future there is to be for her nothing but this--nothing but toil, nothing but struggle, nothing but weariness. Still the demon of Want hovers over her with its dark wings, watching for the stumble, the touch of sickness; which shall bid him descend upon his victim with destruction. God save you, Susie Garland, from this fate! Wherever you are, my prayers follow you. They can find you, even though I can not! CHAPTER XXIII. (from Heysingers Journal.) CHRISTMAS NIGHT. It is Christmas night. Ones heart warms in the light of a happy home, on Christmas day. The Christmas dinner; the Christmas cheer; the Christmas fire; the good old mother coming behind my chair to embrace me and give me the Christmas blessing--she has never failed to do that since I was a boy, I think. I was never away from her on Christmas day. All these things move ones heart to gentle confidences; it seems so natural to tell mother every thing on Christmas day! I suppose, too, the thoughts which crowded on me from without helped the confession. I could not help thinking about that poor little Tootsey, and wondering where she...
