In every age, in every clime, Where'er that cross and story went, In every land, and through all time, Thy name was with the story blent. Twas execrated, stigmatized, As judge unjust by all contemned; No name, methought, so much despised As thine, who that just one condemned. I cannot tell the agony That I endured--no mortal can-- And when I woke I sent to thee: Have naught to do with that just man. SLEEPING YONDER. Written at the request of the managers, and read at the twenty-fifth anniversary of the battle of Lone Jack.; We meet to-day upon the ground Where, five and twenty years ago, The god of war in anger frowned And let his bolts of thunder go; We meet to-day, but not as then; And as the by-gone past we ponder, Remembrance calls to mind the men, The slain in battle, sleeping yonder. A quarter century has passed; How brief to us the time appears! We scarce can realize how fast Go round the swift-revolving years. For five and twenty years have they Reposed beneath the sward of heather; The loyal blue, the Southern gray Reposing there in peace together. They fought as patriots ever should, Each one believing he was right; And now, where then the lone tree stood, Their ashes mingle and unite. Widows and children, orphans left-- No wives or children could be fonder By the hard fate of war bereft Of husbands, fathers, sleeping...
