Nor will other luminaries arise to succeed these setting stars. Whatever instruments of great changes or workers of great mischief may still appear, will move in an orbit so distant from my reader's view, as scarcely to preserve in his eyes any impressive size. Henceforth I shall constantly have to thrust my own insignificant person foremost on the stage; and to draw from my own common place vicissitudes alone, all my means of interesting or attaching my readers. Nor is the want of great names, in whose radiance to walk, and on whose loftiness to raise my little stature, the only growing disadvantage of these pages. The humbler person on whom henceforth exclusively devolves the task of occupying the reader's attention, must even be resigned to lose, as the work advances, what little brilliancy might thus far inhere in himself, as...
