Not illustrated. 1833 Excerpt: . . . arguments against the advancement of knowledge, but without a shadow of reason; such was not the result of the cultivation of science, but the result of an evil disposition; such a man would have been much more vicious if he had continued in ignorance; it rested with every man to draw from his acquisitions of knowledge an increase of happiness--an increase of virtue--an increase of piety. How was it that it had been supposed that the cultivation of abstruse science was at variance with true religious feelings nowhere could true religious feelings be found except in a conviction of the power and wisdom of Him who was the Creator of all. It was true, that he could mention names illustrious for talent whose scepticism he had to lament, but it was not the study of Geometry which led them to scepticism. It was a more delightful..
