His background saw him being brought up within the military environment. Unsatisfied with his current employment, he often thinks back to his time in the Army. His father had been a soldier and it was Richards decision to follow him on this career path. But the parade ground, torturous PT lessons, adventure training and the military skills tests he would have to endure, are only the start of his journey. He would then have to prove himself to his peers within his Squadron. This would be easier said than done, having such a highly regarded father in the same Regiment. In his first months, he needed to be subservient, and accept the practical jokes played on him. His father had warned him it would happen, and was all part of being a new soldier in the British Army. The initial months in the Regiment he would learn his trade as a tank crewman, in camp and on the plains of the Luneburger Heide, Soltau in Germany. The cold winter nights, lack of sleep and being on constant lookout for the infamous drop bears. Yet by the end of his first exercise he would become to be accepted. The experiences of the walled city of Berlin for twenty four months, would last in his memory for years to come. The citys night life, sporting competitions and continuous crash outs, would enrich his military and personal life. The cold war in North West Germany, Richard would meet his mentor, a man he would respect all his life. Yet after only one training season, he would be forced to move on, and begin his search for...
