No satisfaction, on the other hand, can be drawn from the forty-one third-class craft, which are even more lacking in the quality of swiftness than the larger ones. Twenty-four had a nominal forced trial speed of 19 knots or slightly over when new, and, for the most part, with forced draught, but it is extremely doubtful if on service they could steam faster than 17 or 18; in other words, considerably less than the newer battleships, and in a rough sea their speed would be greatly diminished owing to their small size. From these too flattering assessments of our cruiser speed it will be seen that we have--If, as is claimed by Captain Mahan, and has been repeatedly urged by every competent naval student, rapidity of action is...
