Global governance is bound to be undemocratic because, according to Dahrendorf, Internationalisation almost invariably means a loss of democracy 1. Why and if this is the case will be examined in this essay. Governance, in contrast to government², refers to the process of making collective decisions, [...] in international relations, for example, no world government exists to resolve problems but many issues are resolved by negotiation 3. After a discussion about democracy in this context, the focus will be laid on different global intergovernmental organisations (IGOs), followed by a future outlook over possible future alternative possibilities and restraints. It will be shown that international democratic decision making is not likely to happen. Before entering the discussion, it is necessary to define what the term democracy` refers to. Normally...
